

Great Scott is all heart

WYCOMBE Wanderers' striker Keith Scott will win a place in the hearts of all Blues fans, not just for his goalscoring exploits but for the caring letter he wrote to stricken fan Mark Wagstaff.

The 23-year-old supporter lay in a coma after falling from a bridge at Wembley Stadium station on FA Trophy Final day.

Keith's letter, allied with the love of his family and the skill of the nursing staff, has put the young fan back on the road to recovery.

In times when footballers are often portrayed as overpaid layabouts whose only motivation is money, it is nice to be able to report that honest, thoughtful players like Keith are still around.

His actions, and the concern shown by the officials at Wycombe Wanderers, only go to strengthen the family links between the club and its supporters.

We wish Mark a speedy and full recovery. His dad Peter expressed the wish that Blues make a swift return to Wembley next year so that his son can be there to cheer them on. We can only share his sentiments.

In off the post

Dear sir,

I WAS sorry to read that John Granville is leaving Wycombe Wanderers and think that his contribution to the club over the last three years should be recalled.

When he came into the team in February '88 Wycombe had lost 11 of the previous 17 league games and were struggling to survive their first season back in the Conference.

Granville's goalkeeping stiffened an inadequate team, all of whom have since left with the exception of Mark West and enabled the club to avoid relegation.

Would last season's success have been possible if Wycombe had been relegated at the end of the '88 season?
