Blues passion is what's missing

READING the BFP Midweek (December 14) I agree entirely with the sentiments expressed by Lawrie Sanchez, the Blues boss.

I believe the two most important aspects missing from today's squad is, to put it bluntly, fire in the belly and because of the small first team squad available, players confident they are indispensable.

The players under Martin O'Neill's jurisdiction, for most of the time ex-Conference players, used to roar out of the tunnel and I'm certain by their expressions were willing to die for the boss.

Now you see mistakes more reminiscent of Sunday morning games played on Wycombe Rye. It's unbelievable when the three central defenders last Saturday must have had 40 years' experience between them. Totalling up the misplaced passes from our midfield players, they gave the impression they thought because the Millwall team were playing in yellow, they themselves were playing in our away strip!

Several weeks ago we were talking about play-offs now it seems about avoiding relegation again.

Fortunately, Lawrie gets paid to watch the action or inaction and we the regular punters have to fork out on wages they can ill afford.
