

I fancy being a manager sometime

ANOTHER week, another sacking. Walter Smith is the latest managerial casualty of the season after having been sacked by Everton.

Being a football manager must be one of the least secure jobs going, yet I find myself becoming more and more attracted to it.

I would love to go into management. The challenge really appeals to me and if someone gave me the opportunity in the future I would jump at the chance.

It's a huge job though and I would like to do it with someone else, someone like Martin Taylor or Mickey Bell because none of us are getting any younger.

I took my FA Coaching Certificate last summer and will be taking my UEFA B licence this summer.

I've got a wealth of experience in the game and I would like to put something back.

But all that is for the future. I've just agreed a one-year contract at the club and playing for Wycombe and helping them get into the first division is uppermost in my mind at the moment.

I'm very pleased to have another year at the club. It's always felt like my club. I think my form is good at the moment and I was delighted to get my first goal of the year against Huddersfield.

It's just a shame that we let two late goals in right at the death when we had forced our way back into the game and looked as though we were going to be the team that would win it.

It's a strange one because Huddersfield have now done the double over us even though we could have beaten them both times.

We were winning up there before we let them back into it and they won 2-1 and we were certainly unlucky to lose the other night after such a tremendous fightback.

But that's football. We've played all the leading teams recently and we've got another big game at Brentford tomorrow. They have done really well this season but we beat them 5-3 in the league earlier in the season and also put them out of the LDV Trophy.
