

Blues are no threat to the play-offs

ADAM COOPER

IT'S been another another entertaining week in the life of a Wanderers fan, proving more proof that we don't have the consistency to pose any real threat to the play-off positions in the near future.

The question on the lips of every disgruntled fan on the way home from Chesterfield was what was Lawrie Sanchez thinking of?

After a below-par performance from most of the players the manager made them say sorry for the 90 minutes of hell we'd been put through.

Although I'm sure Mr Sanchez only had our best interests at heart, had he forgotten our players are not children?

The gaffer not only watched most of the game from the stand, but made three of the most bizarre substitutions I have ever seen, before he publicly humiliated all of our players, who I'm sure were already aware that a 4-0 mauling to relegation-threatened Chesterfield was not a good result.

The star of the show once again was Aussie keeper Frank Talia who you could only feel sorry for as his defence fell apart in front of him. Although he conceded four of the poorest goals I have ever seen a Wycombe defence concede he made save after save to keep the score in single figures.

The other players who my heart went out to were substitutes Gavin Holligan, Martyn Lee and Andy Rammell who were put on to liven things up but none of these players looked like they knew what they were doing.

Holligan produced an awful lot of hard work but was playing as a centre half, left wing back, centre midfielder and a striker all at the same time, while Lee chased around the centre of the field like a balloon rapidly deflating Andy Rammell was given no service what so ever.
