WANDERERS manager Tony Adams has thrown his weight behind England's Euro 2004 bid by signing a huge flag of support which will accompany the England team.

Adams, who last Saturday was voted into England's all time dream team, is England's most successful European Championship captain of all time.

He led them to the semi-finals of the 1996 tournament where they were beaten on penalties by Germany and he is hoping the current crop of players can go one better.

And he was delighted to sign the giant St George's cross when it visited High Wycombe as part of its nationwide tour before being flown out with David Beckham and the team to Portugal.

Adams was voted into England's fantasy XI as the country's best central defender, alongside World Cup winning captain Bobby Moore, in Channel Four's England's Dream Team programme on Saturday.

The former Arsenal legend, who won four league championships and three FA Cups with the Gunners, won 66 caps and scored five goals in a glittering England career.

He skippered England on 15 times, was first touted as the new Moore when he broke into the national side and pundits on the Channel Four programme, which was run in conjunction with Observer Sport, praised Adams for his leadership, tenacity and thou-shall-not-pass attitude, along with his ability to overcome problems with alcohol.
