

Matt Bloomfield says it was a great source of pride to see three of his Chairboys players representing their respective countries on international duty last weekend.

Joe Low made his senior debut for Wales in their victory over Gibraltar, for whom Tjay De Barr led the attack in the first occasion of two Wanderers team-mates going head-to-head on the international stage.

Dale Taylor was also handed his first two starts for the Northern Ireland national team, and the Blues boss said he was a happy man as he followed the action from home:

"I was really proud," he told the press on Thursday. "I watched the Wales-Gibraltar game online and it was great to watch Joe and Tjay go up against each other. They played really well and with Dale also earning his first starts and rightly being praised by his manager, it was a fantastic weekend for everyone associated with Wycombe.

"I kept in touch with the lads over WhatsApp to see how they were getting on. As a management team we're judged on results, but we also really believe in development, so to see three of our younger players playing international football was a source of great pride. We love having these young lads here.

"This club has really developed over the years, especially with Rob and Pete's help in moving the club forward. We've been able to attract players like Sam Vokes and Richard Keogh who have plenty of international caps between them, and now we're seeing these younger lads being handed their chances and grabbing them with both hands.

"We have to continue to move this club forward and I love the work that we're doing, with so many people working so hard to improve us day in, day out."
